

California-style reasoning on Daybreak development

Re: "Reno gives Daybreak project a second shot,"
Sept. 13:

On the radio, one of the City Council members who voted against the project actually made the comment that her reason for rejection was "changes in the weather." It is amazing the level of stupidity bringing the absurd argument about climate change into this process. Study density, water use, services needed etc., but we don't need the idiocy of people believing in the Green New Deal as a reason to stifle reasonable development. We definitely don't want to be another California.

Developers will be long-gone when the next flood hits

If the Reno City Council gives the go-ahead to the Newport Pacific Land developer in the next meeting, you may be assured that the developer and his team will be back home in California when the next massive flood occurs in the Butler Ranch floodplain, area! Then what? Shades of Lemmon Valley!
